gierende taxauerat, Wrt. Voc. ii. 122, 6. Perhaps the passage to which this gloss belongs is Ald. 27, 14: Sibi usurpans tantopere taxauerat, other glosses to which are, taxauerat, i. indicauerat hē dēme, An. Ox. 2014: usurpans geauligende, 7, 118; taxauerat, i. indicauerat, possederat hē dēme, Hpt. Gl. 454, 3. As in the Corpus Glossary the gi- form of the prefix is very rare (gi-brec, Wrt. Voc. ii. 124, 6, is the single instance, unless gierende be another), and as there is no other instance of ærendan (the verb is always ærendian) perhaps gierende is incorrect. If, however, it is correct, it seems to be nearer in meaning to usurpans than to taxauerat.

gold-blōma. Add: A gold-bloom (v. N. E. D.), marigold (?). In favour of the meaning 'golden mass' it may be noted that blōma is not found in A. S. with the sense 'bloom', 'blossom'; and the occurrence of hordfæte and gewelegade in the passage seems to suggest that with goldblōma is connected the idea of 'wealth', 'treasure'. In favour of 'marigold' it may be said that both O. Sax. and O. H. Ger., as well as Goth. and Icel., have forms meaning 'bloom' corresponding to A. S. blōma, and the actual compound, goldh-blōme = amellus occurs in O. L. Ger. (Gall. 117). Cf. too Du. goud-bloem; Ger. gold-blume; Swed. guld-blomma marigold:—Crist se goldblōma, Bl. H. 105, 5. grundsopa. Substitute: grund-sopa, an; m. The word translates cartilago in the following glosses:—Grundsopa (-sopa) cartilago, Txts. 49, 402; Wrt. Voc. ii. 13, 50. Cartilago grundsopa, coriza, sternutatio fnora, 128, 79, 80. In the glossary from which the last instance is taken the Latin words are arranged alphabetically, so that probably coriza, . . . fnora is not an independent entry but should be taken with cartilago. This supposition is made still more probable by a later gloss, where coriza occurs correctly among co-words—coriza, i. sternutatio, cartilagines negebærc vel fnora, Wrt. Voc. ii. 135, 77. According to these two glosses cartilago should have much the same meaning as coriza (v. negebærc), and so too should grundsopa. This meaning would not be far from that given for the word in Prompt. Parv.—growndesope (ground-sope, groupson) of any lycoure fex, sedimen, a meaning belonging also to Dutch grondsoep. Apparently a different meaning is given to the word in another M.E. vocabulary. In a list 'Nomina arborum et earum ructuum' are these consecutive items—Cortex bark; liber, interior pars corticis; suber, intima pars corticis; abdomen grundsoppe, Wrt. Voc. i. 229, 24–27. Elsewhere (Wrt. Voc. i. 200, 46) abdomen is explained by pinguedo porci: could abdomen in the previous case refer to exudation on the bark of a tree? [Cf. gruzapa cartilago, Gall. 121.]

grund-stán. Add: A ground-stone (v. N. E. D.):—Grundstánas cemento, i. petre, Wrt. Voc. ii. 130, 64.

These are the 'feower maðmas' (l. 1027), given to Beowulf by Hrothgar, of which the first is elsewhere (1021–2) described as 'segen gyldenre, hroden hiltecumbor'. It would seem, then, to have been an ensign, which had at the head of its shaft (hiltie) the figure of a boar. Perhaps the poet of the Exodus had the same kind of ensign in mind where he says that the tribe of Judah, 'Hæfden him tō segne . . . gyldenre león', Exod. 319–21.

Cnut.; halsfangium eius emendet, 606, 12); gif hine man gebinde, forgilde be healfan were, 350, 15. ¶ It formed the first part of the compensation (wer) paid to the friends of a slain person, and it is in this connection that most detail is given, the amount, time of payment, and recipients of the healsfang being stated:—Twelthyndes mannes wer is twelf hund scyllinga . . . Gif man ofslægen weorde, gyldē hine man swā hē geboren sý. And riht is ðæt se slaga . . . finde wærborh . . . þonne þæt gedōn sý, ðonne rære man cyninges munde . . . Of ðām dæge ðe ðæt healsfang āgōlden sý on .xxi. nihtan gyldē man ðā manbōte . . . 392, 3-23: 190, 10. Further details concerning the healsfang in the case of the ceorl may be gained from the laws of Henry I, which show that the healsfang was part of the wer:—In omni werigildo debet halsfang primo reddi, sicut were modus erit . . . Qui natus sit ad iiii. libras [= twihindus homo] . . . halsfang eius sunt v marc, que faciunt xii. sol. et vi. den. Si quis ad iiii. libras persoluenidus occidatur, et ad id res ueniat, ut precio natalis eius componendus sit, primo debent reddi xii. sol. et vi. den. et in eua numerari. Reddantur uero patri uel filio uel fratri . . . et ipsi diuidant inter se. A die qua uerā uadiata est in xxi diem debet halsfang reddi, et hoc indinsum habeant a ceteris . . . reddatur vii sol. et vi den. ad expletionem xx sol. (i. e. the healsfang (= 12s. 6d.) + 7s. 6d. made the first pound) [Then three successive pounds were to be paid, making four pounds in all, the amount of the slain man's wer], 581, 8-582, 17. According to the laws of William I the widow of a slain man shared (or received) the healsfang, 498, 499, § 9. [Healsfang means literally the seizing by the neck or throat (collicipium is the rendering of the word in the old Latin version of Cnut's Laws, Ll. Lbmn. 339, 24: 343, 25). Cf. the passage in Beowulf, where in the description of such an action heals and fōn are used: Fýrdraca . . . ræde on þone rōfan, . . . heals calne ymbefēng biteran bānum, 2691. Its formation may be compared with that of feaxfang (an action to which the law attached a penalty), a word which with the similar berdfang is found in the Frisian laws. In these laws, too, is mentioned the offence of seizing by the hals (Huaso orem grypt oen syn hals, dat di adema hor ut ner in mey), to which the term healsfang might very well have been applied in Old English. As in the Old English legal phraseology the word which denotes an offence denotes also the fine which is to be paid for that offence, healsfang in the first instance might have denoted the action, then the fine paid for the assault, and then, like wergild, have come to be regarded as a standard for fines in the case of other offences (cf. first passage under (2) above:—Hwilum be wergyld, hwilum be halsfange). And it may be noted that in two of the instances where a fine is determined by healsfang the offences involve violence, unlawful disarming, and manslaughter. Halsfang occurs in Frisian law, but its meaning is not defined. Richtofen explains it as a 'Menschen- oder Mädchen-raub'. The word occurs in Icelandic, as well as a verb hals-fengja, meaning respectively an embrace and to embrace.]

Ll. Th. ii. 298, 23 supra: seām-hors). They were used, too, in hunting. When the Danes came Byrhtnoth seems to have been hawking: He lēt him of handon fleōgan hafoc, By. 7; the huntsman of Ælfric's Colloquy receives a horse from the king (Coll. M. 22, 35 supra); and from the story in Bd. 5, 6 (supra) it seems that racing was not altogether unknown at a very early time. But if a passage in Alfred's translation of Boethius describes English feeling, riding as an amusement was little known (v. ridan). In war, too, and in farming horses were less used than in later times. In the Chronicle under the year 1055 (v. supra) a defeat of the English is attributed to their being on horses, a mode of fighting which according to Florence of Worcester was 'contra morem'; and Byrhtnoth, who bids his men drive away their horses (By. 2 supra), himself alights (By. 23). According to the colloquy ploughing was done with oxen, and the difference between the English and Scandinavian practice may explain the reason for Alfred's noting Ohthere's account of the use of horses in ploughing (Ors. I, 1 in Dict.)] v. ge-stēd-, rād-, seām-, stōð-hors. Cf. too eoh, hengest, mearh, mere, stēda, wicg.
